Your WhoFitsMe Compatibility Snapshot

Your strongest relationship need is a partner who combines emotional presence with independent judgment.

Alex, this is a concise preview of the patterns your full report develops in depth.

How this snapshot was built

This anonymized sample demonstrates the free WhoFitsMe result layout. A live snapshot is created from the completed assessment and highlights the first evidence-supported partner-fit pattern.

Your central relationship pattern

You appear to need both closeness and strength. Warmth without independent judgment may initially feel easy but can become unsatisfying; strength without responsiveness can create distance or power struggles. Your best fit is someone who can stay emotionally present, disagree constructively, and remain dependable in ordinary life.

What may matter most in a partner

- Visible emotional investment without constant reassurance-seeking.
- Independent judgment without hostility or withdrawal.
- Direct communication when expectations, boundaries, or plans change.
- A compatible level of closeness, affection, and intimate openness.

First warning pattern

Strong attraction can receive more authority than repeated behavior has earned. The useful early question is not only "Do I want this person?" but also "Does their behavior make trust and daily life easier over time?"

Who may fit you better

- A warm, direct person whose actions remain steady after the first intensity settles.
- Someone who can accept your initiative without becoming passive.
- A partner who can discuss closeness, privacy, exclusivity, and intimate preferences without pressure or shame.

Who may disappoint you

- A highly attractive person whose reliability becomes visible only after you are invested.
- A conflict-avoidant partner who leaves important issues unresolved.
- A compliant partner who agrees easily but cannot offer honest challenge or independent judgment.

One practical test

Across the first three dates

Record one attraction signal and one practical-fit signal after each meaningful interaction. Continue only when attraction remains present while reliability, treatment, and ordinary-life compatibility become clearer.
